

Clark College Foundation taps Washougal man as new CFO

A Washougal man is the new chief financial officer at the Clark College Foundation.

Daniel J. Rogers is an accounting professional with nonprofit audit experience. He has worked for Moss Adams as an audit manager, and is a licensed CPA in Oregon and Washington. He has worked on the foundation's audit for the past seven years.

As CFO of the foundation, he will maintain its fiscal integrity of the organization by overseeing its administrative functions, fiancés and accounting, and asset management.

"We are fortunate to have someone with Daniel's expertise join our staff," said Lisa Gilbert, foundation president/CEO. "As a CPA and our former auditor, he has extensive knowledge about our organization and the credentials to keep us at the forefront of best practices."

Rogers is a graduate of Clark College and Washington State University Vancouver, where he earned a bachelor's degree in business administration with an accounting emphasis.

Established in 1973, the Clark College Foundation is a nonprofit, tax-exempt public charity.

It serves as the fundraising arm of Clark College to support student access to educational programs and services.