Jason Martinez

Change was the buzzword for Jason Martinez in 1998. The Vancouver native was faced with a lay-off from his production job at Hewlett-Packard. Though he qualified for a retraining package under NAFTA, he still felt the stress of supporting a family on unemployment. "It was tough, basically getting less than half of what you were when you were working," says Jason.

With a number of educational options available, Jason chose Clark College. After considering programs in electronics and computer networking, he settled on the Software Solutions Development degree. "Programming is something I had done as a hobby since I was a kid, I have a knack for it. The choice has paid off in droves," he says.

Jason began working in his field even prior to graduation, creating an application for Clark's Career Center. That job put him in the position to hear of an opening at Clark for a database instructor. "I thought, hey, shoot for the stars," says Jason. He began teaching the class the following quarter. After working for a number of local companies, Jason is settled in his current position with an energy consulting company that writes billing systems and metering software.

Never losing his passion for teaching, Jason is training the next wave of displaced workers in Visual Basic and Access. "I've had the pleasure of seeing a lot of them succeed. They're scared, just like I was, but I try to encourage them to see it as an opportunity," Jason says. Teaching is his way of giving back what he received, "Clark gave me a head start in the real world and the tools to acquire more knowledge," he says.
