appointed to the Clark College Board of Trustees by Gov. Chris Gregoire. She will succeed Rhona Sen Hoss, who has served as a trustee for 10 years.

A Camas resident, Strong has more than ten years of experience working with public and private agencies to develop strategies that improve organizational cultural humility. As chief diversity officer for Clark County, she leads the county's efforts to integrate diversity and inclusion measures into policy and practice in the county.

Strong is currently the committee chair of the Clark County Diversity Advisory Committee and the Clark County Diversity Steering Committee. She is co-chair of the 2012 Northwest Public Employees Diversity Conference and serves on the board of We Reign.

"Rekah's commitment to community and its success makes her a valuable asset to the board," said Gregoire. "She cares about the people she serves and understands the importance of a solid foundation in education. I welcome her to this new role."

After attending Clark College, Strong transferred to Portland State University, where she earned a bachelor's degree in criminal justice and a master's degree in social work (administration). She is currently continuing her studies at Portland State, pursuing a Ph.D. in social work.
