

Satellite Clark College campus is a good idea

I am writing in regard to the article reflecting on Bob Knight's first year as the President of Clark College (The Reflector, May 14, 2008).

My main reason for responding to this article is to express my interest in the idea of a new satellite location either in Battle Ground or Ridgefield. The article stated that a new building somewhere in one of these areas is at the top of the state funding list for community college growth and could begin operating by 2015.

The reason this has sparked my attention is because I feel it would be an excellent idea to open a satellite campus out this way. True, it is possible to take Clark College classes at the Washington State University Vancouver campus, but there is only a limited amount Clark College courses offered there.

I, myself, will no longer be attending Clark College in the year 2015, but with the continued growth north of the college campus, more and more students are attending the college each year.

I'm glad I came across this article and hope there are others out there who also like the idea of a Clark College satellite campus in the Battle Ground or Ridgefield areas.

Christopher Levi
Battle Ground, WA